Intelligent Wireless Personal Alarm is Top Class

Ireland's SECURECOM TECHNOLOGIES, the company behind the world's first ever intelligent Personal Alarm is planning to license this much anticipated bluetooth product into the UK and European Security Market. The innovative device should be available to customers as early as autumn 2006. But why is this panic button so special, we've seen plenty before? Because Securecom's Wireless Personal Alarm is, in a word, smart!

The miniature device, once activated by the user, will connect with their bluetooth enabled mobile phone to send an emergency SMS message to a list of predefined emergency numbers. The device will then interrogate the phone for a GPS receiver, if the phone cannot get a GPS signal or is not equipped with GPS, this clever little device will search the surrounding environment for available GPS, even crack the password code if necessary to connect and find its co-ordinates.

If the Wireless Personal Alarm fails to connect with ambient GPS, it will request co-ordinates from a subscribed LBS (location based service), and insert the co-ordinates into a text message which again is sent to the list of predefined emergency numbers.

So now your emergency contacts will know that you need help and where you are located. The device will also allow you to inform your emergency contacts whether it's a high priority or low priority situation. The device then takes its performance up another level. It opens a voice channel so that the situation can be recorded by your emergency contact, allowing the situation to be assessed and acted upon.

It's not only smart, it's small too. Weighing only at 18 g it can be discreetly sewn into uniforms for more inconspicuous activation. Securecom's inexpensive security solution can be integrated with most systems or used in combination with a monitoring service for optimum use.
